and a cartridge belt to give power and pomp to the weapon. It was his vague intention to make the "Nepperhans," as he called the Berrigan boys and others living on Nepperhan Avenue or near by, let him alone.

He had no intention of seeking trouble, however; the mere possession of the shiny, smoothly-working pistol was joy enough for any twelve-year-old. It was a joy that was doubled when he was able to display the revolver in confidence to his fellows, however, and so yesterday he invited his cousins, John Bynicki, twelve years old, and Raymond, ten, of 20 Centre Street, to go hunting with him.

Sister in Rôle of Hunting Dog Sister in Rôle of Hunting Dog

Frank's three-year-old sister had to go along, of course, because he was "minding" her, but she went incognito, and at best was to play only the rôle of hunting dog. In the depths of the woods where moose or bear or lions might be encountered at any moment Frank displayed his treasure, and his fellow hunters and "the dog" gathered about him to gaze upon it with awe and reverence.

For the first time thye realized that there was sound basis for the magnificent bravado with which Frank had proposed the hunting excursion, regardless of raiding "Nepperhans" and for the air of mystery with which he had invested the expedition. John and Raymond were allowed to handle the weapon under the expert supervision of the chief huntsman, but "sister" was rebuked sternly when she attempted to do so and was reminded that she was the dog.

The hunters exchanged glances of involuntary apprehension. The "Nepperhans" were out in force. Besides the redoubtable William there were his brothers, Joseph and John, and John Hickey, Arthur Warren, George Watsen and Raymond Trask, the latter being thirteen years old and a host in himself.

Soon the missiles were pattering thick and fast about the hunters, and Frank's cousins turned reproachful eyes upon him. Frank's grasp closed on the butt of the revolver. Intimation of the emergency committee that the youngsters might go on a hunger strike as a protest against their routing home was not fulfilled.

The youngsters ate hearitly of a luncheon in the pavilion with officers and members of the Zoölogical Society.

H. W. Merkel and Lee S. Crandall, members of the society, acted as guides. Either the animals were themselves surprised at a visit from so many children all at once or else the noise aroused them to all their antics.

An interpreter said "They like best the elephans and monkeys. And, oh, yes, the giraffes—we have none of them in Europe and Russia."

So many Russians of the city flocked to the park that the authorities in charge found it difficult to keep control of 'the crowd of refugees.

Red Cross authorities and other leaders in charge kept a watchful eye upon the youngsters to prevent them from being unfairly aroused by Bolshevik agitators. A member of the expedition said an old man, evidently a Russian acted suspiciously. He was carrying a suitcase and wandering back and forth near a group of the children. Presently he opened his suitcase. It was filled with apples.

sees is being urgently inquired by the emergency committee.

Protests by Russians Here
According to Miss Todd, the committee to tee's interest in behalf of the children is the result of many indignant protests by Russians of this city to the effect that the youngsters should be returned direct to their parents. Representatives of the committee who have questioned many of the refugees through interpreters say the children greatly resent being returned to their families by way of France.

A mass meeting has been called by the emergency committee for to-night at 8 o'clock at the Lexington Operation Avenue. Red Cross officials have been invited to attend to explain to the Russians who will attend the reason for the children's destination.

Melodrama Not Disguised

One thing this producer never does do and that is disguise or attempt to disguise the fact that he is dealing in melodrama. His titles, if anything, accentuate this fact, as for instance, when the heroine, a timid country child, says, "I was deceived by this arch villain with a mock marriage!" or words to that effect.

And yet there is his photography, which shows some brand new, untereamed of effects, his snow scenes of such wonderful beauty that they were applauded again and again, all of the tender touches which give his people even in their wildest melodrama, a semblance of reality—all of these are Griffith.

It is difficult to write of this latest

Tense Moment in Play

There was something different about the photography, too, and we don't know how to describe it better than to say it had the effect of the old stere-optic opticon views, instead of appearing flat.

The scenario was made by Anthony Paul Kelly. The photography is by G. W. Bitzer and Hendrick Sartov. In the cast besides those already mentioned are Kate Bruce, Vivid Ogden, Emily Fitzroy.

To us the greatest moment in the picture, not forgetting the ice rescue, was where the pale-martyr turns and denounces her betrayer as she is being driven out into the storm.

Snow Storm Gives Thrill

Anna was one of those wronged girls who was deceived by a mock marriage. She went to a distant town where her child was born and died, went to work for the squire's 'family in another town, met her betrayer when he called on the daughter of the house, suffered in silence, was finally exposed as a scarlet woman, was caught in a snow storm and nearly frozen to death, which process her persecutors must have considered tantamount to puri-

Ziegfeld Frolic Proves the Be

Barthelmess the Hero

Richard Barthelmess was David Bartlett, the hero man. Along about the middle of the picture some one be-hind us whispered, "He'll never have such another chance as he had in 'Broken Blossoms.'" But that was be-fore the ice scenes. This part, where Anna and David are taught in the ice By Harriette Underhill

When Lowell Sherman gave a short laugh, accompanied by a shrug of the shoulders, in the screen version of "Way Down East," and said: "You must tell no one of our marriage, be-must tell no one of our marriage, because we were never married," our impulse to turn around to where he sat in the chair just behind us and box him over the ears was controlled just in time.

D. W. Griffith's picture was shown for the first time at the Forty-fourth Street Theater last night, and that every one in the theater shared our feelings was plain as the picture progressed. The villain was hissed, the hero was cheered, and when the stupendous ice scenes were shown the theater rocked with the applause. Never in our five years' experience with motion pictures have we seen such a demonstration.

"Way Down East" is "Way Down East" whether it be the stage or the screen, but what Mr. Griffith has done with it no one else ever could have done.

Melodrama Not Disguised

Sherman a Regular Villain

Lowell Sherman, than whom there is no more villainous villain, was excellent in the part of Lennox Sanderson, whose specialty was mock marriages. Burr McIntosh was the squire, Creighton Hale the wool-gathering professor and Mary Hay the sweetest ingenue imaginable. Wonder if Lottie blair Parker ever had any idea that Kate Brewster was going to turn out like that when she wrote the part so many years ago? Miss Hay is a most vivacious and charming young person. Mr. Griffith has introduced some bits of real color that are most effective and from now on one may expect colored pictures appearing sporadically in all the big features beginning in about three months, only, by the time other people copy Mr. Griffith he has forgotten all about that particular feature and is making something brand new.
